

Federal Occupational Health

Medical Surveillance Program

Medical surveillance monitors the health of employees who work in settings where they may be exposed to occupational health hazards. Federal Occupational Health (FOH) medical surveillance specialists will perform a comprehensive needs assessment to identify possible exposures to workplace health hazards, thereby determining if a medical surveillance program is appropriate for your agency.

Reliable support

FOH provides a committed team of specialists knowledgeable about your agency, its mission and its culture. These specialists include a medical review officer and others who are solely dedicated to working alongside your agency's managers. FOH's highly experienced specialists will help your agency comply with all applicable regulations, both federal (such as OSHA and EPA) and other (such as union or agency-specific regulations).

FOH can even provide expert witness testimony in litigation.

Determining occupational hazard exposure

FOH provides industrial hygiene services, including hazard analysis and risk and exposure assessments to determine strategies for lessening physical, chemical, radiological, and biological stressors.

FOH's dependable, comprehensive, and integrated medical surveillance services include:

- ▶ Exposure assessment
- ▶ Selection of personnel for surveillance
- ▶ Selection of screening tests and examination components

- ▶ Physical examinations
- ▶ Interpretation and notification of test results
- ▶ Recordkeeping
- ▶ Written exposure control plan
- ▶ Occupational health consultation

Medical surveillance and clearance examinations for law enforcement

FOH has extensive experience in providing occupational health services, including medical surveillance, to law enforcement agencies. FOH understands the intense and often hazardous nature of the jobs federal law enforcement personnel perform. We offer a wide range of tailored services to meet agencies' unique occupational health needs and adhere to their rigorous standards.

Wellness within your reach.
